Cost decline leads to widespread adoption

The average cost of industrial robots has been in a steady decline since the mid-2000s. Advances in technology and efficiency continue to drive down cost as well as make robots much more capable. More companies are finding it advantageous to implement robots because of the reduced cost and improved capabilities.

Invest in the Early Adoption Phase

Robotics are still in the early adoption phase. The companies who have not yet adopted robotics are concerned about identifying and achieving return on investment. This concern is becoming much easier to address as average cost lowers and wages rise simultaneously, Worldwide robotics sales have increased significantly as cost has fallen.

Why IBOT?
